VIRGINIA'S EX-GOVERNORS.

The foolhardy Cleveland Plaindealer throws down the gauntlet to all the states in the Union, thus:

"The death of a former governor of Alabama the other day leads the Birmingham Age-Herald to remark that the state has seen all of her governors up to the advent of the present century pass away."

"Ohio has five living ex-governors, four of whom were elected to the office and one rose to the position by the death of his chief. This state, however, elects every two years, twice as often as Alabama, which makes her mortality record in respect to governors about equal to Alabama's."

"Against the Southern state's two former governors Ohio presents her five and challenges the two for any sort of honorable contest. One of the five is in the midst of a fight for election to the United States Senate, and another, now American ambassador to France, may become a candidate for the nomination. Still another of the five, it is admitted, would make a very strong bid for his party nomination for the Senate if he were to announce an ambition in that direction."

"Has any state a longer list of living ex-governors than Ohio?"

Does the Plaindealer think Ohio can put forth such a challenge as this and get away with it? Does it think the Mother of States and Statesmen—to say nothing of Presidents—can't beat Ohio's record in this respect, as well as in all others?"

"Has any state a longer list of living ex-governors than Ohio?" Virginia can point to a list as long, and this despite the fact that her governors are elected every four years instead of two, as in Ohio. There's the oldest, who is now doing service as the editor of a big Virginia daily newspaper, and who believes his present work is the most important he has ever done; there's our Southwest Virginia farmer ex-governor; there's our Congressman, who has served the United States abroad; there's our United States Senator, chairman of an important committee, and there's our Richmond-Petersburg lawyer, who has just retired from office, but who, if past habits and inclinations are to be reckoned with, will soon be in public office again."

The nerve of Ohio thinking she can excel Virginia in the greatness or longevity of her statesmen. Times-Dispatch.

JOHN BARRY, AMERICAN.

John Barry, who is called "the father of the American Navy," and whose statue was unveiled in Washington Saturday, deserves the title "commandore," though there was no such grade in the United States Navy until 1862. But though officially only captain, he was the ranking officer of our navy when permanently organized under the act of 1774, and should be classed with the great sea warriors of an age which numbered many illustrious names on its roll of fame. He possessed not only the dash and courage of his race, but a genius for naval warfare that made the slender resources at his command during the Revolution produce wonderful results. We have been a long time getting from the nation the credit his statue has taken its place at the national capitol among the great figures in our national history.

It is not at all wonderful that the slender resources at his command during the Revolution produced wonderful results. We have been a long time getting from the nation the credit his statue has taken its place at the national capitol among the great figures in our national history.

nationality either, but he had as the President well puts it, "dropped the hyphen out of his name" and heart, because he had become an American in spirit and thought and purpose as well as in formal citizenship. Barry may be said to have had the soul of an American to start with. He came of a country which has been yearning for freedom for centuries, and our Declaration of Independence spoke a language that had been on the lips of Ireland for generations. It is not often that men of Barry's race have a divided sentimental allegiance after they come to this country. Like that splendid Revolutionary captain, they become Americans in every moral and mental fibre, and are proud to bear a name that answers all the aspirations of the Irish heart. Baltimore Sun.

EDUCATION BY MOVING PICTURES.

Wonderful as the development and progress of the moving picture has been in recent years, it requires no special gift of foresight to discern for it an even greater future. Having seen the films supplant the old-fashioned melodrama, Thomas Edison has recently announced that he will not consider his life work done until he can make the film characters talk and sing, where they now only act; that he intends to make grand opera for 10 cents possible. Already much progress has been made with the "talking pictures," though they are at present far short of perfection.

At the moment the most daring field of the motion picture man is the battlefield, the promise being that before long American parents may be able to walk around the corner and see their sons engaged in warfare in Mexico.

Yet, with all the progress that has been made, the great value of motion pictures as an educational medium has not been given anywhere near the recognition to which it is entitled, or, at least, it is a value of which full advantage has not been taken. Religious organizations have utilized the films to some extent in depicting Bible scenes, and events of world-interest are regularly shown on the screens in places of amusement, but the unequalled possibilities for instruction and the creation of public sentiment in favor of great and useful institutions and movements for the general benefit have not been utilized or appreciated.

There is no reason why the motion picture could not be adopted, too, as a valuable aid to study in the public schools, and thus the public taste with regard to the subjects portrayed would be gradually improved, so that in time possibly the services of a film censor would become unnecessary.—Washington Herald.

THE Harrisonburg News-Record quotes an exchange as explaining that the reason Western apple growers have larger sales and get better prices than those of Virginia is that they use more care in packing, and continues: "We believe that this statement can be applied to more things than apples as furnished to customers by many of our Eastern farmers. Our observation has been that much of the Western fruit is not so good in flavor as the Eastern fruit—although we may be prejudiced in this regard. But it appears to be a fact that the Western fruit grower plays business, first, last and all the time. He starts out with the proposition that he is going to make money out of his orchard, and he studies to raise the finest fruit possible. What he lacks in flavor he makes up in size and color." Virginia apples are celebrated in Virginia and are growing in favor in other sections, but they still do not compete successfully with the apples of Oregon and other Pacific Coast states. The apples are as good—we think better—and the explanation of the greater celebrity of Western fruit can be found, we think, in the statements of the News-Record. Times-Dispatch.

WORK WAITS IN THE FIELDS.

Not all of the unemployed are able-bodied, not all are fitted to do manual labor, not all want to know how to do it even if they were physically able, but for a very large number of them there will be little excuse if they fail to find employment. The farm situation in Massachusetts sets the state authorities to work in an attempt to get the unemployed into the fields. The state has a large number of unemployed men, and it is looking for the asking, if they will do it. This is a sensible way of solving the unemployment problem. The complaint is unseasonable. DR. ROOP MAKES ADDRESS

Eastern College Seniors Invested With Academic Cap and Gown—Chapel Service.

President Roop's address upon the investiture of seniors with the academic cap and gown at Eastern College Chapel, May 19, was as follows:

It is a happy privilege to assemble for the formal investiture of the seniors with the academic cap and gown in this chapel, hallowed by sacred memories, the trusting place where God has met the students of this college face to face and instructed them in the way of life, truth and destiny.

You have reached the first milestone of collegiate distinction, and to-day you wear the badge of seniority, the mark of scholastic attainment, the insignia of the Bachelor's degree.

Life has frequently been likened unto a garment throughout all literature, both ancient and modern. The Greeks called the world kosmos, meaning dress or adornment, and so regarded it as an exquisite garment spread out before us. The Apostle James compares pure and undefiled religion to a garment which must be examined closely when we purchase it and pressed again and again to retain its beauty and comeliness. Often do we speak of the warp and woof of life, that intricate tapestry in which day by day we are weaving the deeds, thoughts and experiences through which we pass.

This garment of dark and sombre hue is indicative of wisdom, but may you not confound this pursuit with any other earthly quest. Learning rarely means more than the acquisition of facts about life, nature and the world; yet with all this learning which may be as comprehensive as an encyclopedia, we may utterly fail to reach the goal of true education. Scholarship is generally confined to some one department of thought and investigation, leaving all other realms untouched or undiscovered. The girdle of the mind embraces all truth and all knowledge, and not until we recognize the interrelation and correlation of one thought with another thought and with all thought may we be regarded as genuine scholars.

Culture oftentimes weakens and refines away the native powers of the mind instead of strengthening and improving them. Furthermore, wisdom teaches us that we must reach some fixity and certainty of belief, although we may be wafted hither and thither upon the vast ocean of thought. Yet, on the other hand, we must not swing to the opposite extreme of never allowing ourselves to alter our beliefs, especially when we are in the wrong, simply because we want to have it appear that we are always consistent. Emerson calls such consistency a sin for each succeeding day should find us farther on than the previous one, and, as life advances, our living and thinking should become more normal and rational by correcting every fallacy and mistake wherever it may exist. All such dogmatists

Standing in blind and naked ignorance Delivering wrong judgments unashamed.

Thus we see that wisdom is not to be identified with shallow learning, narrow scholarship, weakening culture, stiff-laced orthodoxy or unbridled license of thought, but must include within its scope a thorough knowledge of the past, a deep perception into the present, a wise insight into the future and withal the divine illumination clarifying and interpreting the sum total of our human experience.

Again, this costume suggests that piety can never be separated from culture without doing irreparable harm, since it had its origin in the temptations of the serpent. There was a time when education was supposed to be antithetical to piety and indeed antagonistic to the best interests of religion, but happily few vestiges of such a fallacy remain in the spiritual outlook of our day. Learning without piety produces cold and lifeless fossils, while piety without learning produces wild fanatics, lacking the symmetry which a well-balanced intellectual life alone can give.

God, truth and righteousness constitute the only true goal, the only rational objective worthy of your thought and ambition. Material wealth, political power, social prestige and intellectual supremacy must ever be held secondary and accessory to this larger thought and purpose. Realization of yourselves through the vision of the higher life should be the object of your quest, demanding the cultivation of the best that is within you.

As every scholar disciplined to the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man, a householder, who brings forth out of his treasure things new and old, may you go forth into the arena of life to consecrate your powers in loyal and unselfish service in behalf of your fellowmen, contributing your share to bring in that halcyon day when all men everywhere shall be brothers, when righteousness shall be exalter, and when the truth shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

MONUMENT AT ARLINGTON

Tribute to Confederate Dead Being Done by Virginia Sculptor, Sir Moses Ezekiel.

To the monuments in Washington and its environs is soon to be added a fine achievement of the sculptor's art. That monument will stand at Arlington in the center of the plot where lie the bones of 267 Confederate soldiers, most of whom as prisoners of war died in the Union military hospitals that once stood among the camps and forts of the Arlington highlands. This monument is the work of Sir Moses Ezekiel, a Virginian long resident in Rome. Sir Moses Ezekiel as a cadet at the Virginia Military Institute marched with the 225 cadets from Lexington to New Market, 100 miles, who then fought side by side with veterans and against veterans and earned inextinguishable fame for their corps and alma mater.

The monument which will be unveiled at Arlington June 4 may very properly be ascribed in a sense to President McKinley. In the course of a speech which he made at Atlanta, Ga., December 21, 1898, he said: "The time is now come in the evolution of public sentiment and feeling under the providence of God when in the spirit of fraternity we should share with you in the care of the graves of Confederate soldiers." The Broadway Rouse

Camp of Confederate Veterans of Washington and other camps made inquiry as to the Confederate soldiers buried at Arlington, and June 6, 1900, a bill prepared by Gen. Marcus J. Wright, and introduced by Senator Hawley of Connecticut, became a law, under authority of which the Confederate bones at Arlington were collected and reinterred in one section of the cemetery, which was made beautiful with shrubs and flowers. Headstones were provided and the name, rank, state and organization, where known, were inscribed on them. Memorial day services have been held in this plot ever since it was dedicated to Confederate graves. The monument project early began to take on shape and the corner stone of the memorial was laid in November, 1912, with solemn ceremonies. Washington women were among the first if not the first to begin the collection of funds for the raising of this monument. — Washington Star.

MANASSAS HIGH SCHOOL

Hints of commencement night appear now and then in the close study of composition in story and essay, and several excellent papers are expected as a result.

Prizes will be awarded in English throughout the high school from the sophomore class to the normal class. Herman Steele is again in the race, but there are other competitors who will give him a spirited run for first place.

Alfred Prescott and Claiborne Blackwell are in the depths of historical research on biographical matter concerning the early development of our country.

Miss Osbourn's visit to New York was most successful in promoting the interests of the normal department and a statement of results will appear in a later issue.

MRS. HODGE RETURNS

Mrs. Hodge is practising her choruses in the familiar classical compositions with the addition of the best of our modern choral music. We all rejoice at her recovery from her painful accident, realizing the loss which the school would sustain without her directorship of the commencement exercises.

Miss Metz, not content with devoted work at Ruffner, has added evening classes in Virginia to her list of activities. West Avenue frequently feasts its eyes upon the pleasant group of seniors deep in the intricacies of Latin hexameters. Only three weeks more and the coveted diplomas will be bestowed upon faithful and devoted scholars whose years at Ruffner have been filled with duties carefully performed.

Each day you hear expressed the deep regret by teachers and students at the passing out of well-loved graduates from the familiar places, and all predict a bright and happy future for each one of the band.

ONE SMILE THAT CAME OFF

Information That Man Was Sitting on His Hat—Withheld for Fear of Spelling Expression.

"Look pleasant," said the photographer. The sitter raised his eyes and gave a sickening smirk. "Your head just a little more to the left, please," suggested the voice from the black shroud. "No, don't move the eyes."

Like a man suffering from a stiff neck or an Eiffel tower collar, the sitter tilted his head gluggerly till it reached the desired angle, and he resembled a dying fish trying not to mind.

"That's very nice; very nice, indeed," said the photographer. "Stay just there while I make the exposure. He removed the cap as he spoke and counted out a minute and three-quarters. "Thank you," he observed. "You can get up. I'm afraid you have been sitting on your hat."

"My hat," roared the sitter angrily, regarding the flattened felt. "Why the dickens didn't you tell me I was sitting on my hat?"

"My dear sir," protested the photographer, blandly, "that would have spoiled your expression."—Pittsburgh Chronicle.

Giving Magna Awey.

A beautiful young widow sat in her deck chair in the stern and near her sat a very handsome man. The widow's daughter, a cute little girl of four or five years, crossed over to the man and said:

"Whose your name?"

"Her name, 'Williamson,'" was the reply.

"Is you married?"

"No, I'm a bachelor."

The child turned to the mother and said:

"What else did you tell me to ask him, mamma?"

He Lacked the Nerve.

A town character, who had been in trouble with the police many times, was arrested recently on a minor criminal charge. The arresting officer was amazed when the fellow appeared in police court with a lawyer prepared to make a defense. Finally his case was called and the judge asked:

"Prisoner, are you guilty or not guilty?"

"Let my lawyer plead not guilty for me, judge," was the reply. "I ain't got the nerve."—Kansas City Star.

Praise of Eloquence.

An Alabama negro was defended in court by Senator Morgan. Having cleared the negro of the charge the senator said to him, "Rastus, did you really steal the apple?"

Well, Marso Morgan, "It was just like this," said Rastus. "I really thought that I did steal dat apple, but after what you said to the jury I know I didn't."—The Presbyterian of the South.

WHY IT FAILED

First Actor—And you went out on the road in a genuine sea drama? Was the trip successful?

Second Actor—No; there were too many tight bosses.

Returning a Favor.

"It's going to be war to the knife," declared the suburban stink, who was feeding the chickens.

"What now?" asked the friend.

"Why, Bittie sent me a box of axle grease and advised me to use it on my lawn mower."

"Well, I sent it back and told him to use it on his daughter's voice."

Realism.

"What has become of the emotional actress who wept 'real tears'?"

"Out of fate," replied the busy producer. "What he are girling the public now is a leading man who swears 'real swear words.'"

HIS HOLIDAY SPORT

But for the Girl It Was the Great Event of Her Life.

By LARRY FRALICK.
The girl stood on the threshold of life looking forward into its vast vistas through the gold-hued glasses of youth. She was not what would be called a pretty girl, but the gods had endowed her with the divine quality of imagination and ideality. To the unobserving her rather thin, pale and irregular features, surmounted by a wonderful shock of red hair, marked her as distinctly commonplace. The more observing and analytical who took time to look into her bright, restless, sparkling eyes paused and said: "There's something in that Graceland girl."

It remained for Frederic Walling Haggood, a man of the world, connoisseur and dilettante, to discover the true worth and vital beauty which lay within her.

It happened at the Springs, where she was taken by her grandmother, with whom she lived—being an orphan—and who regarded Marie simply and wholly as one born to minister to her comfort and convenience. For the first time in her lonesome, narrow, provincial life the girl had an opportunity to see life as she had dreamed it. It was not supposed to be a pleasure trip for her—oh, not at all. Grandma Graceland had heard that the Springs held wonderful curative properties for her rheumatism and straightway had hied herself thither—taking Marie along too as a sort of necessary evil.

But Marie was not a servant in any sense of the word, and nobody would have resented an insinuation to that effect more than her aristocratic old grandmother, who treated her as such in their personal relations, but who would have stayed alive any person without the Graceland family who dared put a slight upon one of "the royal family." And so Marie plunged into the great world and saw it at close range—for the Springs was not exclusively a health resort. More people, perhaps, came for pleasure and recreation than for the curative properties of the waters.

Well, ultimately, Fred Haggood, tired of all things and at the Springs for a rest and a change, met this curious damsel—and with the true scent of the thoroughbred detected the great things which lay hidden within her. Where others saw her irregular features he saw the essential vitality radiating from her eyes. Where others saw her pallid complexion he saw the seductive lines of her litesome figure. Where others saw her shock of red hair he saw her ardent, imaginative, girlish soul. Her very ignorance and innocence attracted him—and it pleased his humor to pay debt and scientific cour to this budding bit of femininity.

To her it was as incense sent by the gods. Never had she had court paid her even by the callow youths of the village—she was not the type to attract the average youth and her nature was such as to repel rather than to gain admirers. But when this polished gentleman bowed over her hand and used all the arts of the man of the world she responded with an ardent which nearly carried him off his feet. It was a new experience to him as well as to her, and it interested him more than he supposed it possible to be interested in any woman affair—at his time of life and his stage of experience.

Being so unique an experience, he pursued it the more industriously, and it was not many days before the most ardent love-scenes were being enacted in the quiet groves and dells about the Springs.

It was an epoch in her career when one moonlit evening he threw his arms about her and drew her to him with all his strength while his eyes looked down into hers and spoke volumes. Without hesitation she twined her arms about his neck and raised her scarlet lips to his. In the moment of that passionate kiss all her dreams, all her hopes, all the fructiferous longings which had been feeding and she passed from girlhood to womanhood.

There were but a few days of this delicious joy for her, however, and then the old story was re-enacted. Haggood was called back to the city on business. He went away—and faded from her life. There were a few letters, it is true, but of a most non-committal sort and growing more and more informal on his part as they grew more infrequent.

At last she understood and then she realized that the great passion of her life had come to her and had passed by. She knew that while to her it had been the great thing of all her life, it had been to him but a holiday sport. She knew that she had been to him a mere pastime, and, as the pity of it, she knew that faith in mankind had passed from her life. Now even if the true knight came she could not respond. That which she had all her life wished for the most had eluded her and could never come again. It was a bitter thing, but she fought it out as only great and passionate natures can fight out the tragedies of life.

And so they went their several ways. And then the iron entered deeply into her soul and she hungered and thirsted for revenge. For she learned that he had married a woman of great wealth and pursued a life of pleasure and luxurious ease. When the girl learned of she clenched her thin, nervous fingers and swore within her soul that some day, somehow, somewhere,

For shattering her hopes and her idealities.

For you see it meant more to her than it did to him. He had still his life and ease and pursued the even tenor of his way. The summer idyll while most delightful, was but an incident. To her it was the catastrophe of her life, the burial of her ideals, the end of her hopes. And she swore upon the altar of her ideals that some day she would make him pay the price for his treachery.

Time passed on and one beautiful fall some ten years later the girl came again to the Springs. Time does wonderful things. Besides healing the crying hurt of her quivering heart, it had made a very different woman of her. The old grandmother had died a year after her first visit to the Springs, and, untried of marvels, had left her entire fortune to the insignificant girl who had cared for her so patiently for so many weary years. As possessor of this great fortune she had chosen to travel and to mix with the best and greatest of the earth. From a callow girl she became one of the wisest and most attractive women of the earth. Beyond count were the hearts laid at her feet—but she would have none of them. Her romance had had its day and died. And so she came back to the Springs a most sought-for and self-pained woman of the world.

Now at this time, strange to say, Mr. Frederic Walling Haggood also appeared at the Springs—this time, however, drawn there wholly for medicinal reasons. Through a series of reverses the great fortune of his wife had been swallowed up and Haggood, untried in any money-getting vocation, had been unable to support his wife in even decent comfort. The shame and humiliation had so preyed upon his mind and spirit that he had sickened and was making a last struggle to regain health sufficient to go in and make a fight to establish himself.

All this and much more did Marie learn during the first few days at the Springs. And she laughed in triumph at the spectacle of this man in the very ashes of defeat. At last her revenge was before her and she settled down to enjoy it to the very last slip.

One day she met him, still bravely debonair and handsome, but in his eyes was the mark of the hunted and upon his features was the promise of death. And that night she thought long and prayerfully and her pillow was wet with tears for the first time in many years. On the following day she summoned her lawyer from the city and, despite his protests at her plans, sent him scurrying back with instructions the most imperative over lawyer had. Presently again appeared Mr. Lawyer with information which disclosed the true inwardness of the Haggoods' affairs. It then appeared that a sum of money—considerable, it is true, but very small in proportion to the amount involved—would rescue the fortune of Mrs. Haggood and start them again along the lines of prosperity.

"Go and pay it!" she commanded. "And be certain that no human being except we two knows how it was paid."

"But it will cost half your fortune," exclaimed the lawyer, aghast. "You heard my orders," replied the girl wearily. "Good night."

And this finally was her revenge. She had the sinner's joy of watching the color return to his cheek—which it did when the terrible financial strain was removed, and when he returned to his wife, buoyant and happy, she gave him her hand and wished him Godspeed in all he desired.

She sent him back to the woman he had married never knowing the girl whom he had taught to love him and who loved him still, despite his desertion, had saved him.

This was her revenge. (Copyright by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

"Copy" Near at Hand.

Kathleen Norris' novel, "The Treasure," deals with a home problem in which the servant question figures, and thereby hangs a tale.

While "The Treasure" was being written one of the maids in Mrs. Norris' employ was discovered interestedly reading the manuscript.

"Why, this has a lot about servants and running a kitchen in it, hasn't it?" she exclaimed.

Mrs. Norris admitted that the book presented some modern phases of an old subject, with a suggested solution.

"Well," said the maid artlessly, "you certainly ought to be able to make it vivid—you had enough trouble with servants."

Motor Cargo Boat on English Canal.

With the close of the year 1912 came the arrival of the first motor cargo boat to be seen in the Leeds canals. The boat had a carrying capacity of 70 tons and brought a cargo of cement which had come from London by steamer to Goolse and had been transhipped there for conveyance to Leeds. While a fleet of canal boats drawn by a steam tug is a common sight on the Leeds canals, the sight of a cargo boat driven by motor power is a novelty and has been cited as a sign of the revolution which may be expected in river and canal traffic.—Consul Homer M. Byington, Leeds.

Persia Loses Silkworms.

The native varieties of silkworms have entirely disappeared from Persia, owing to the ravages of pebrine, though they have been bred for many years at the Government silk worm farms at Moupen, France. In the past, quantities have been taken to Persia imported from Turkey and also raised in Europe, France and Australia.
