THE WAR IN AFRICA.

Remarkable Preparations Made to Conquer Little Ashanti

While the war alarms are sounding England has ended her campaign against Little Ashanti. This map will help to make the situation clear and it is worth examining for it is doubtless a small campaign in Africa was ever more admirably planned.

The black line, says the New York Sun, shows the route the British column followed from Cape Coast to Kumassan, the residence of King Prembeh. The peculiar feature of the campaign was that this line of march was prepared, as far as possible, before the British troops were landed from their ships. England wanted it to be a surprise to the Ashanti, and such a thing could not be achieved without a lot of preparatory work.

The troops were nearly all the way through forest made almost impassable by the dense undergrowth. Thousands of natives have been employed in cutting a wide road from the coast to the river. Early in December thousands of natives embarked on the various ports along the Gold Coast for Cape Coast, and were set at work carrying the supplies into the interior. A large supply depot was established at Manse and another at Frahan. Other striking European command have been stringing a telegraph line along the route, and it is now completed to Frahan. The engineer corps completed a bridge over the Frahan river at Frahan, and at least accounts were bringing a small river, little further north. The route at first different camps, stations have been built between the coast and Frahan, so that the troops did not need to pick their way at the end of the day's march. In fact, everything was done to ease the soldiers' work and enable them to march with celerity.

The troops comprise 7000 white soldiers, 400 men from the West India regiment, and 6000 hussars, in all 12,700 men. Under the command of Sir Pringle Roberts, Frahan was the base of operations. A hospital containing 40 beds has been built here, and a smaller one at Frahan. Roberts' headquarters are at Frahan. As the column advanced beyond the Frahan stations were advanced with carriers and hammocks for the "speedy transportation of the sick to the hospital or to the coast. These stations were a desperate post, by means of which it is impossible to maintain a regular line of communication with the coast.

Stores of every kind have to be carried on the heads of natives, and at least 15,000 men and women, each carrying about 50 pounds, are engaged beyond the Frahan river in this service. It is a heavy task, the water of the region is almost insupportable, and all the time the men are being harassed by the mosquitoes which permeate into large canyons. Tanks through Frahan filters, which were used to keep the water fresh, were used at the defensive posts. The artillery consists of a small mountain battery, a battery of six seven-pounder field guns, a Maxim and a number of machine guns.

If Frembeh and his advisers had known what they would have made it hot for the enemy while all these preparations were going forward. But they were sitting quietly at Frahan, evidently preferring to take their ease all in a lump at the capital itself. The king probably doesn't yet realize the very uncomfortable box he is in. Roberts' forces, against him, are only 12,700 men, but they are from the north. The king of Koromah, which is shown on the map, has agreed to help the English and to march on the Ashanti capital (Isuma) and ammunition. He sent to him. No force of hussars with a large quantity of gunpowder, and lead for arming the tribesmen.
