A Case of Goose

By Donald Adams

Young ardent graduate of the Colebrook College of Agriculture and Applied Science, Mr. Chester was out for a little stroll after the lecture on plant pathology at the yesterday evening session. He was trying to refresh his mind with a moment of leisure from the stresses of the day, when a sudden gust of wind caught him off guard. Mr. Chester, who usually kept a firm grip on his glasses, lost control and they were sent flying through the air. In the confusion, Mr. Chester turned to follow the glasses, and before he knew it, he had walked into a crowded street corner in a small town. He was not on his campus grounds, and the thought of being in such a public place with his glasses lost made him feel vulnerable and exposed.

"I shouldn't look like this," he thought to himself. "I'm supposed to be at the College, not here." "This isn't where I belong," he realized. "I belong at the College, not here in this small town." He was lost and had no idea how to get back to his campus. He felt like he was in a new world, and he was alone in it.

"This isn't where I belong," he thought again. "I should be at the College, not here. I don't belong here." He was lost, and he didn't know how to get back to his campus. He felt like he was in a new world, and he was alone in it.

"This isn't where I belong," he thought again. "I should be at the College, not here. I don't belong here."
