CARRANZA, VILLA AND OTHERS

Peace has been officially declared in Mexico and the world awaits the next move.

Carranza will march the army of revolt into the capital and proceed to form a new government based upon the constitution and the doctrine of faith of the constitutionalists. Carranza, Villa and others will expound the faith.

The faith will be mainly what Villa decrees.

The voice of Carranza "and others" will be weak and of tle avail.

Washington will "suggest," and the suggestions will be courteously received by Carranza, passed on to Villa, and then promptly ful not to topple over. Because.

Villa is the backbone of the revolution.

Carranza has furnished the whiskers, but Ville has supplithe brains, the courage and the power to execute.

Carranza has rested peacefully in the shade, while Villa has won battles in the heat of the blazing sun-

Carranza has talked loudly, while Villa has fought manfully. Carranza has basked in the glory of being "first chief," while Villa has thrashed the tar out of Huerta's army.

Carranza is a high-born orator and a dreamer, while Villa is an ex-bandit and a fighter. Carranza is the head of the revolution, but Villa is its teetl and its claws. Carranza may be the next president, but Villa will be the power which makes or unmakes him. Carranza may be a tower of strength in the new order of things, girl. but Villa will be the base upon which it rests.

A house without a foundation would soon fall: and Carranza without Villa could not sustain the weight of his own whiskers. For Villa, ex-bandit, is a man of deeds, the strongest arm in the republic.

Villa is Mexico today.

And so it is with many men, with some women, in the matter of newspaper advertising, although the ranks of the overlookers are becoming thinner every year.

Some people never let an opportunity slide by.

No advertisement is overlooked, lest it contained an article of which they are in need and which may be purchased to a better advantage now than later.

All people read the advertisements. Some make it a business, have reduced it to a science, and extract the greatest benefit from even the most insignificant things. It is a big stone in the foundation of their success.

TWO PEOPLE IN A STORE

Have you ever observed the actions of a man and a woman in a store? If not, you still have something to learn.

We spent a few minutes in a local store yesterday and this is what we saw:

A man from the country strolled in, greeted the proprietor a breezy "Hello," remarked about the weather, crop prospects, the latest dog fight and a few other important matters, and eventually remembered that he wanted a curry comb. He took the first one handed him, topsed a dollar on the counter, shoved the change into his pocket without counting, helped himself to an apple, and leisurely foliowed his nose to the street. -

Ten minutes later a woman walked briskly in, handed the clerk a smiling "good morning." and promptly requested to be shown thus-and-so. She picked it up, felt it, held it up to the light, twisted it, turned it over, examined it from ever vantage point, considered the price-and rejected it. It was not just what she was looking for.

Did the clerk have something else? He did. Three different somethings were shown her without any better result. Then the light of the world returned to her first love. tested it. fondled i carressed it, and told the clerk-she guessed it would do. though not exactly what she wanted."

She paid for it, counted her change carefully, let her eyes roam over the store, took note of numerous things she wanted later or and departed with a fund of information stored up for her nex
