Confederate Soldiers Buried in the Manassas, Virginia Town Cemetery

The old Manassas town cemetery is located on the southside of the town between Route 28 and the railroad and it adjoins 9501 Lee Avenue. The small confederate section is in the rear of the main cemetery and is separated from it by a wrought-iron fence.

The cemetery is dominated by a large stone monument capped by a life-size sculptured image of a Confederate soldier. At the base of the monument an inscription states that the builder of the monument was J. R. Tillett, Co. H. 15th Virginia Cavalry.

Most of the 500 plus burials are unknown and only a few gravestones exist. The soldiers interred in the cemetery were brought in after the First Battle of Manassas, fought on July 21, 1861, and the Second Battle of Manassas, fought on Aug. 29/30, 1862.

Following is a list of soldiers taken from inscriptions on the existing tombstones, some of which were hard to read due to deterioration caused by the ravages of time and weather.

following the move of the county seat here from Brentsville to take advantage of the railroad. A new courthouse was built in 1984.

Travel 1 block south on Grant Ave.; turn right on Church St.; go 2 blocks to the Confederate Cemetery on the left.

3. CONFEDERATE CEMETERY. In 1867, CSA veteran W.S. Fewell donated one acre of land for a Confederate Cemetery, to be administered by the Ladies Memorial Association. By 1868, over 250 Southern soldiers had been reinterred here from their temporary resting places on nearby farms and fields.

In 1874, the Town of Manassas acquired the adjoining land and began a Citizen's Cemetery. In 1889, the red sandstone monument was dedicated. The speakers were General W.H.F. Lee, son of Robert E. Lee, and Sen. John W. Daniel, the "Lame Lion of Virginia." The bronze statue atop the monument was added in 1909 and is titled: "At Rest." A listing of those buried here is available at the public library.

Take Center St. (Rt.28) north 2 blocks to the intersection with Grant Ave. (Rt.234). Turn right and go under the railroad tracks. Take the first right, which is Prince William St., and follow it to Jennie Dean Middle School. The marker is in the grassy area on your left as you enter the school ground.

4. JENNIE DEAN was born near Manassas in 1852 as a slave. After the war, many blacks moved into Washington seeking employment and a new life. Jennie became a domestic in the city, but maintained her ties locally.

By the 1870's she had returned to Prince William and she began to organize Sunday Schools that also taught cooking, sewing, and other skills. Believing that only through education could blacks advance themselves, Jennie realized that the times -- and the practical education. Working tire found enough support to establish Manassas Industrial School For Youth in 1893. Donations came from Andrew Carnegie and other businessmen. Funds were also raised and the school taught such carpentry, masonry, and blacksmithing. In 1938, when the school became a public system as the regional high school.

Return to Prince William St. and travel east to the intersection with Tudor Lane; turn left and go 1 block to the intersection with Fairview Ave.
