"But what do you think of Maryland?"

"The warm vigor and elequence with which Senator Arthur Pue Gorman always defended the tariff reform policy to which the democratic party was pledged by the Chicago platform renders the Maryland election more directly and intensely a rebuke to the advocates of tariff reform and commercial freedom than do the results in any of the States before mentioned."

BULL RUN AND APPOMATTOX The public sale of the McLean estate, advertised for December 2, by Messars-Thornton and Round, brings to our mind the most singular coincidence we recall in our reading of history. The first meeting of the Army of the Potomac and the Army of Northern Virginis took place at Blackburn's Ford, July 18, 1861, and brought on the first pitched battle of the war. At 10 a.m. of that day Besuregard took up his headquarters at the McLean house and there McDowell attacked him with a heavy force of infantry and artillery. On the 9th of April, 1865, after 1,361 days of almost constant fighting, the commanders of these two armies, Grant and Lee, met at the McLean house at Appointation and drew up the terms of surrender. When Beauregard evacuated Manassas, Major McLean removed his family to Fauquier. As the tide of the war rolled again around them they removed the second time to Lusen-burg, and there in 1863 the Major returned one day and told them he would move them this time where the sound of battle "would never reach them more." They rented the brick house at Appomattox, which has become his-toric and toward which all the strategy of the war converged, and around which it so suddenly culminated. And so it happened, as Major Melean frequently said, that the war began on him and ended on him. Another point is worthy of mention in this connection. The Melean estate embraced in 1861 over 1,400 acres, including some of the best land of the county. Over one half of this has been sold out to eight differ-ent persons, at from six to afteen dol-lars per acre. The largest part is now embraced in the magnificent farm of Robert Portner. The remainder of the tract is now subdivided and will be sold at December Court. The change from large plantations to small farms is thus illustrated, showing an inevitable tend ency of cur civilization. - Manassas Journal. MONETARY AND COMMERCIAL
