

FOLLOWING TRENDS OF Falun gong

Adherents learn truthfulness, compassion and tolerance

By TARA SLATE DONALDSON
tdonaldson@timespapers.com

In a small church room, 10 people stand in a circle, eyes closed, feet slightly spread and hands pressed together as though in prayer. A tape recorder plays soft music in the background and, as a quiet voice speaks in Chinese, the members slowly begin raising and lowering their arms.

Watching the exercise, it seems unlikely that these slow graceful movements could have led to so much bloodshed and controversy. But falun gong has struck fear and anger into the Chinese government just as it brings peace and health to its practitioners.

At Trinity Episcopal Church in Manassas, a small group of adherents meets each Sunday afternoon to spend an hour running through meditative exercises.

"People will sometimes ask are the exercises physical or spiritual in nature," Jim Giragosian, of Catharpin, said. "They are both because in falun gong there is no difference."

Falun gong is a holistic practice intended to improve the mind, body and spirit. While the exercises are the most visible part of the practice, the core lies in the principles of truthfulness, compassion and tolerance.

"The exercises are not really the most significant part of the practice but they are probably the most visible," Giragosian said. "Cultivating our hearts

See FALUN, Page A5

errors in trial

By DUSTY SMITH
dsmith@timespapers.com

In briefs filed last month at the Virginia Supreme Court, defense attorneys for Justin Michael Wolfe, 21, listed 37 errors they say occurred during Wolfe's January murder trial.

A Prince William County jury convicted Wolfe in January and sentenced him to death after 22-year-old Owen Merton Barber IV, the confessed triggerman, testified that Wolfe ordered the murder of Daniel R. Petrole Jr., 21, to escape a drug debt.

Petrole, who was living in Bristow at the time of the murder,

See WOLFE, Page A5

Haymarket's Mt. Atlas gets reprieve

County could not save historic home, but maybe state can

By DUSTY SMITH
dsmith@timespapers.com

The aging structure north of Haymarket known as Mount Atlas may have found its savior.

As land, residents and historic debris have disappeared from the estate, Mount Atlas continues to draw interest from those who seek to preserve buildings that help tell the county's history.

A nonprofit preservation group has agreed to take on the task of finding either a person or group to take responsibility for the home and possibly restore it.

"We are on the path," said Gordon Lohr, of the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities. "We are hoping a private homeowner will buy it and have a historic home to live in."

The group does not retain ownership of the properties it works to protect, but rather works as a mechanism to ensure the preservation of the historic properties it oversees, Lohr said.

"It's a picture of our past," said Don Wilson, a historian with the county's library system, referring to historic structures. "At the rate we're losing them, we cannot afford to lose anymore."

After the Board of County Supervisors decided in 2000 not to include the 1795 home in its historic renovation plan, many thought the home would be demolished as the land it sits on is further developed.

The county boasts a significant number of historic structures, but, over the years, many have not been maintained. County officials are forced to pick and choose which of the many historic properties they can afford to renovate and maintain.

Two years ago, Mount Atlas was cut from the list of properties the county would attempt to save after it was determined that the cost of moving the building to the Brentsville Courthouse Historic Site would be almost $250,000.

"The county was given the opportunity by the estate to move the house, restore it," said Robert Bainbridge, the county's historic preservation planner.

But the deteriorating condition of the home meant that significant structural work would have to be done to make the building stable enough to transport. Supervisors decided the $250,000 price tag was too high.

At the time, Supervisor Ed See ATLAS, Page A3

Times Staff Photo/Dusty Smith
MOUNT ATLAS: The Mount Atlas home, located near Waterfall Park north of Haymarket, was built in 1795. Its deteriorated condition could add considerably to the cost of moving the structure.

Prince William Times Fri, Nov 15, 2002 A1

SITE FILE: Mt. Atlas
PRINCE WILLIAM PUBLIC LIBRARY SYSTEM
RELIC/Bull Run Reg Lib Manassas, VA

Sunday's gas leak was false alarm

Prince William, Manassas and Manassas Park police were inundated with phone calls Sunday as hundreds of residents reported a strong smell of natural gas.

Fire and rescue units were unable to locate the source of the smell, which was reported from all parts of Manassas as well as the neighboring city of Manassas Park and the surrounding county.

At 2:55 p.m., an official with Washington Gas determined that the smell was not a natural gas leak.

Earlier in the day, a natural gas pumping station in Fauquier County, owned by Transco Gas Company, experienced an overflow of the odorant that is added to the gas to give it the distinctive smell. Natural gas has no odor and gas companies add the easily recognized odor to the gas so people can tell if there is a leak.

But no natural gas had been released into the atmosphere Sunday and there was no danger of fire or explosion.

The Washington Gas official told police that reports of the smell had been reported as far away as Gaithersburg, Md.

Officials are reminding residents that if the smell is stronger inside than outside, they should evacuate the building immediately and call 9-1-1. —Tara State Donaldson

ATLAS

From Page A1

Wilbourn (R-Gainesville) was quoted in local newspapers as saying, "If we go down the road of saving every house because it is old, we would soon deplete the county's budget."

That is not to say the county shirks its duty in regard to preservation. Work is now under way to restore Ben Lomond Manor and the Brentsville Courthouse. The Old Manassas Courthouse was completed earlier this year.

In fact, the county has a long history of preserving its history. The biggest problem is the large number of potentially historic projects that could be undertaken.

But since the high cost deterred board members from saving Mount Atlas, Barnbridge said he looked for other ways to save the house.

"It is pretty significant in terms of its architecture," he said, explaining the home's importance.

Wilson agreed that the home was worth saving and suggested its run-down condition may be the reason for so little interest in its preservation.

"Because of the condition of the house, there's been no great move to save it," Wilson said. "It is one of the oldest buildings in that part of the county. It is a significant house from that time period. It is worth saving."

The property where Mount Atlas sits was part of Robert "King" Carter's 41,000-acre Bull Run Tract.

In 1795, Peter B. Whiting built the home that remains today.

The house has changed hands several times, serving as a home for families named Carter, Whiting, Foley, Gosson and Padgett.

Barton Padgett and his wife, the former Pauline Gosson, were the last people to live in the home.

When they moved into a smaller ranch house built on the same property, many items were left in the historic structure.

Through the windows, bed frames can be seen leaning against the walls. An old heater that looks much like an old-fashioned console stereo remains sitting by the fireplace.

A mural known as "Maiden at Peace" was sold long ago. Most of what remains is trash. An old suit of clothing—dusty, gray and worn—still hangs on the formerly screened-in back porch.

Times Staff Photo/Dusty Smith

LEFT BEHIND: An old suit of clothing—dusty, gray and worn—still hangs on the formerly screened-in back porch. The clothes are among many items, including furniture and debris, left at the house.

Only the front portion of the three-story house is original. The rear portion of the house was a later add-on, according to county records.

Supervisors now plan to rezone the parcel so that the historic home may be sold separately from the rancher that sits next to it. Lohr said his group has already been working with a Realtor to find a new owner.

HAIL DAMAGE

Dear Homeowner,

If you live in Northern Virginia, your siding and perhaps your roof and gutters may have been damaged by recent hailstorms. Locally-based Wadden Construction, insurance replacement specialists for the past 15 years, has helped thousands of Northern Virginia residents with their damage claims. If your home has hail damage, you may be entitled to a combination of a new roof, gutters and a complete wrap of your home with a quality vinyl product FOR THE PROTECTION OF YOUR INVESTMENT.

GOOD YEAR
Gainesville Automotive Service

Gemini
VA SAFETY & EMISSION INSPECTION

Oil Change
only $19.95

- Change oil using Mobil Dine Clean Oil™
- Lube chassis • Replace oil filter
- Check all fluids • Check tire pressure
- Safety check

BG Fuel Induction Service
only $114.95

- Improve your gas mileage
- Boost your horsepower
- Clean the carbon out of your fuel

OUR EXPERIENCE

FERRIS AUTOMOTIVE
VOLVO / IMPORT SPECIALISTS

MAKES THE DIFFERENCE

Daniel Ferris
Former Technical Trainer for
VOLVO CARS OF NORTH AMERICA

- Over 28 Years Of Import Experience
- All Factory Scheduled Maintenance
- Pre-Purchase Inspections
- All Major Credit Cards

6583 MERCHANT PLACE, WARRENTON, VA
Off Ft. 29 in the New Baltimore Business Park
Toll Free 866-347-9800

www.ferrisautomotive.com

- ASE Master Tech
- NHTSA
- GM
- Ford
- Chrysler

Bowen / attorney's track if that motor-Road, mitted at the age AS

S

L

Court, errors ry and ber IV, murder, under, age AS